

To the right Honourable the House of Lords
London. I. Petitioners the now assembled in Parliament.
K

The humble petition of the Young men, Apprentices and Seamen, in, and about the City of London.

In all submission humbly sheweth,

THAT your Petitioners have layen a long time (as it is well knowne) under unsupportable pressures, for the relief of which they have exhibited many petitions, yet so it is, that to this day wee have not received that relief which our necessities require, and our hopes did promise us, But our miseries doe daily increase & grow upon us, trading so extraordinarily decaying, and feares threatening ruine to this kingdome, increasing by reason of that height and head, to which the Rebels in Ireland have attained, and which they go on still to perfect, by those new supplies of ayd and strength that they do receive, which threatens present destruction unto this Kingdome, unless it be forthwith suppressed,

W H E R E F O R E your petitioners are constrained humbly to supplicate, that the relief of Ireland, according to his Majesties Command, and the Commons desire may be dispatched, that the kingdome at home may be forthwith put into a posture of warre and defence, that that which hinders the same, whether persons or causes may be declared. In as much as your petitioners cannot but conceive, that such causes as are pretended are but fained; and such persons are either factors for, or favourers of the Rebellious rout in Ireland. That the present pressures which lie upon us are so unsupportable, that if present remedy be not afforded from the hands of this Honourable house, as from the hands of Wise Physitians, we have just cause to feare that multitudes wil be ready to lay hold on that remedie which is next at hand, Oppression (as Solomon saith) making wise men mad.

And your petitioners shall pray, &c:

Printed in the yeare, 1641.

10350. g. 11

---

1-19.

To the right Honourable the House of Lords
London. I. Petitioners etc.
now assembled in Parliament.
K

The humble petition of the Young men, Apprentices and Seamen, in, and about the City of London.

In all submission humbly sheweth,

THAT your Petitioners have layen a long time (as it is well knowne) under unsupportable pressures, for the relief of which they have exhibited many petitions, yet so it is, that to this day wee have not received that relief which our necessities require, and our hopes did promise us, But our miseries doe daily increse & grow upon us, trading so extraordinarily decaying, and feares threatening ruine to this kingdome, increasing by reason of that height and head, to which the Rebels in Ireland have attained, and which they go on still to perfect, by those new supplies of ayd and strength that they do receive, which threatens present destruction unto this Kingdome, unless it be forthwith suppressed,

W H E R E F O R E your petitioners are constrained humbly to supplicate, that the relief of Ireland, according to his Majesties Command, and the Commons desire may be dispatched, that the kingdome at home may be forthwith put into a posture of warre and defence, that that which hinders the same, whether persons or causes may be declared. In as much as your petitioners cannot but conceive, that such causes as are pretended are but fained, and such persons are either factors for, or favourers of the Rebellious rout in Ireland. That the present pressures which lie upon us are so unsupportable, that if present remedy be not afforded from the hands of this Honourable house, as from the hands of Wise Physitians, we have just cause to feare that multitudes wil be ready to lay hold on that remedy which is next at hand, Oppression (as Solomon saith) making wise men mad.

And your petitioners shall pray, &c.

Printed in the yeare, 1641.

71